He learns readily by experience and cannot a second time be persuaded to do what has once injured him. He cannot learn to read, but he will turn the pages of a zoology, promptly recognizing the pictures, and showing his familiarity with the traits of the animals represented. He has the sense to throw a rope to a companion who has fallen overboard; and one has been known to submit without resistance to surgical treatment, manifesting gratitude when he experienced the relief which he seemed to expect from the operation. He is persistently studying the working of some tool or machine, learning to use keys, hammers, and even dangerous implements. The brown capuchin is exceedingly fond of investigation, expressing great delight when he finds how to work a lever or a screw; and he never tires of applying in other ways the...
